HOW TO FEED ROSE PLANTS

Those fine roses which experienced gardeners grow are not the result of chance, but are produced by supplying the plants with plenty of food and moisture. If you would have blossoms as fine, you must copy their methods.

Roses of the hybrid tea, or ever-blooming type, do not like company. They should be grown in a bed which is free from the roots of trees and shrubs, and apart from other plants. Prepare the soil of the rose bed to a depth of two feet if possible, never less than twelve inches. Unless the soil contains good quantities of organic material as evidenced by its friable condition, decomposed organic material matter such as compost, or leaf mould, should be incorporated in it.

The rose bed must be well drained. A heavy soil is preferable because it holds moisture well. Since a heavy soil drains slowly, unless the rose bed is on a slope or in an elevated position, artificial drainage should be provided.

At the time rose plants are set out a complete plant food should be mixed with the soil which is then placed about them, at the rate of one heaping tablespoonful per gallon of soil.

For established rose plants an application of plant food should be made in the spring at the rate of four pounds per hundred square feet, or one rounded tablespoon per square foot. Cover the ground around each plant as far out as the top growth extends. This measures approximately the spread of the roots. Six to eight weeks later a two-pound application should be made. Do not apply plant food after August 1. As an aid in retaining soil moisture a mulch of rotted leaves or peat moss should be maintained.

We find that roses require a great deal of water. So it is best that they be soaked at least every other day, and a heavy syringing of water with hose to keep the foliage cleaned and also to keep insect life in check.

MISTAKES OFTEN MADE WITH PLANT FOOD

It is a mistake to consider plant food and the manner in which plants feed as mysterious. There is no mystery or magic in either. Plant food is a product scientifically prepared to supply necessary food elements which are likely to be deficient in the soil elements which are necessary for the growth of all plants. A complete plant food insures that your plants will have at their command a balanced food ration.

However, plant food alone will not compensate for other unfavorable conditions. It will not overcome the effects of poor drainage, improper soil texture, insufficient moisture, or lack of sunlight.

Plant food should be evenly applied. Uneven distribution causes spotty growth, and also introduces the possibility of injury through overfeeding. In applying modern, quick-acting plant foods, it is necessary to read carefully the instructions furnished with them, and follow them exactly, to avoid the possibility of error.

In the case of making a new seed bed or preparing garden soil, the plant food should be mixed with the top soil. This can usually be done when stirring the soil to kill weeds, or to level and smooth the soil prior to sowing. Do not apply plant food in layers in the soil.
